Did you know?

- Some animals, like the snowshoe hare and the ptarmigan, actually molt into a white winter coat or plumage as camouflage against snow.
- A red fox's coat grows noticeably thicker in winter, adding extra insulation without changing its color the way some other species do.
- Mountain goats grow a dense winter undercoat beneath their outer fur, then shed it in large, ragged patches as the weather warms.
- Not every winter animal here is built for arctic extremes; many are simply temperate-climate species adapting to an ordinary cold season, distinct from the animals of the far north.
